Hudson faces the music

Hudson Architects is behind plans for a new music school at a £30,000-a-year public school in Norfolk.

Gresham's School in Holt wants to replace its 1960s building with a new school to be named after former pupil Benjamin Britten.

The school — with a circular roof — will include rehearsal, practice and teaching rooms as well as a recording suite, and will look onto a new courtyard also designed by the architect.

Other buildings that will look over the new courtyard include the school's grade II listed chapel and the Auden Theatre, named after the poet WH Auden, another former pupil.
