Home for architecture school secured

Norwich University of the Arts has completed the purchase of a prominent city centre building to house its expanding architecture course and a media studio space.

Boardman House on Princes Street was designed by Edward Boardman in 1879.

Vice-chancellor John Last said: "This is an important acquisition and a milestone in the development of the School of Architecture. Boardman House is a Grade II listed building of great character and prominence in the city and it is particularly fitting a building designed by and named after one of Norfolk's most famous architects should be used in the teaching of a new generation of architects."
